Pecha Kucha 20x20

Social networking that's not for sale.

Your home feed should be filled with what matters to you most, not what a corporation thinks you should see. Radically different social media, back in the hands of the people.

I loved Twitter at first, but now have decided to leave X. Social networks have played an important role in democracy (think "Arab Spring") and can be a wonderful place to exchange ideas with friends, colleagues and strangers alike. I have been using Twitter for over 10 years. The platform used to be relatively open and served as a forum: a village square where people could exchange ideas. However, it has become increasingly apparent that the financial interests of its owner have triggered a change in the rules that I cannot support; it has become clear to me that I personally strongly disagree with the way money drives public discourse. I hope that what will prevail is the idea that a private company can still provide a place for informative, peaceful and intellectually stimulating exchanges.

I am going to spend a bit more time on LinkedIn!
